Challenges to European security: parliamentary perspectives and responses

Monday 15 – Wednesday 17 February 2016 | WP1441

In a changing geopolitical landscape, Eastern Europe is becoming more militarised and its future stability much less certain, largely in response to the challenges posed by Russia. Its actions not only threaten former states of the Soviet Union, but the wider region as a whole, and European states and institutions need to adapt to a new security environment in which an assumed trajectory for post-Cold War era relations is being challenged and often diverted in unexpected ways.

With the fallout from the global financial crisis, and ongoing Eurozone crises, fringe political movements and radical parties are finding success at the ballot box. Russian destabilisation efforts, across the hybrid spectrum, are only exacerbating these trends. This is an issue that goes to the heart of European parliamentary democracy, and frank discussion between parliamentarians is required.

Russian action in Ukraine has raised concern over hybrid conflict to acute new levels, not least due to the possibility that Moscow could employ these tactics elsewhere in Europe. Russia's disinformation campaign and covert tactics in Ukraine have been particularly prominent. It is clear that given the nature of the threat, the full toolbox of instruments available to European nations needs to be marshalled in response. This reassessment needs to include areas such as border security, economic levers, counterpropaganda capabilities, and new mechanisms for the rapid deployment of civilian and military observers.

The parliamentary role will be central to the discussions in every session. Given their access to all government ministries, what coordination role can parliaments play? What place do cross party select committees have in this? How best could parliaments' intelligence, defence, and foreign policy oversight responsibilities be utilised?

1. The contemporary challenge to security in Europe

What are the key challenges to European security in 2015? Why have these challenges emerged? To what extent are there still common security interests and shared norms and values across the Euro-Atlantic area? What are they and is it possible to build on them? How can the key European organisations with security responsibilities – OSCE, NATO, EU, CoE - help the most threatened states in dealing with new security challenges? What is the interaction between internal and external threats to national resilience? How can building capacity against the one reinforce the resilience against the other?

Sven Mikser

Chairman, Foreign Affairs Committee, Parliament of Estonia, Tallinn

Péter Balás

Conseiller Hors Classe, Special Adviser to the Director General, DG Trade, European Commission, Brussels

2. Building national resilience against hybrid threats

What is national resilience? What are its key elements? How do parliamentarians help build this in the face of the increasing and uncertain security threats related to hybrid conflict? Where are the vulnerabilities? How can parliaments ensure that resilience and capacity building is sustainable and lasts longer than the election cycle? How can parliaments help address a method of conflict that will not just blend conventional and irregular capabilities and tactics, but also incorporate political, economic, information, humanitarian and other non-military instruments? What role can parliaments play in domestic capacity building?

Aapo Cederberg

Associate Fellow, Global Fellowship Initiative, Geneva Centre for Security Policy (GCSP), Geneva

Dragan Šormaz

Member of Parliament, National Assembly of the Republic of Serbia, Belgrade

4. Minority rights and nationalist movements

How can the complex dynamics of nationalist movements, minority rights and shifts in the socio-economic fundamentals be unpacked and understood? How do these trends play across the EU and with its near neighbours? How important are Europe-wide links between nationalist parties as well as influence on them from outside Europe? What kind of challenges to political stability and national resilience do these dynamics present, and how can those challenges be addressed?

Boriss Cilevičs

Member of Parliament, Saeima (Parliament) of the Republic of Latvia, Riga

Jennifer Jackson-Preece

Associate Professor of Nationalism, London School of Economics and Political Science

1300-1430

Lunch

1500-1630

5. Corruption and good governance

What is the impact of pervasive corruption on national resilience? What role can parliamentarians play in countering corruption, organised crime, and racketeering? How far can pervasive corruption be eradicated from within a country's institutions? How can this be done in the face of state corruption? Where could parliamentary committees and debates be augmented and bolstered? In what ways can other IPU members assist in capacity building to aid state reform?

Emma Udwin

Deputy Head, Cabinet to Commissioner Hahn, European Commission, Brussels

Bojan Dobovšek

Member of Parliament, National Assembly of the Republic of Slovenia, Ljubljana
